Excerpt from Between Two Rebellions Of all wars, none are so sinful, wasteful and brutal as civil wars; and of all civil wars with which the last century was afflicted, none was so uncivil and unmerciful or so deplorable and lasting in its effects as the American Civil War. Its cost in money was estimated long ago. It amounted to many billions of dollars - more than enough to have bought every slave in the South and sent them back to Africa free in limb and with life-pensions in their pockets! But no true estimate ever has been made of the human wrecks, the home-wrecks and the heartbreaks it caused; and no tongue has ever told one half of the awful struggles that occurred on the terrible battlefields; but when such men as Grant and Sherman, who were in the thick of the fight, said that war is hell and they never wished to see any more of it, we knew what it meant. It meant that they saw fathers, sons and brothers arrayed against each other - slaying each other without mercy, or gnashing at each other like wild beasts.
